

Sexism in sports

by Ian Halperin and Max Wallace

"You can't take money from men's varsity sports to give girls' things."

So said Concordia University's athletic director Ed Enos last year in the documentary, Why the Difference.

This year, the athletics department is under attack from all sides over discrimination against women athletes.

The controversy centers around the huge disparity between funding of men's and women's sports programs at Concordia, as well as the apparent disregard of women's concerns by athletics officials.

That the position of Women's Athletics Director has always been occupied by a man illustrates the insensitivity of the department, according to those involved.

Womens' Soccer Coach Gerard McKee is among the many critics of the women's program.

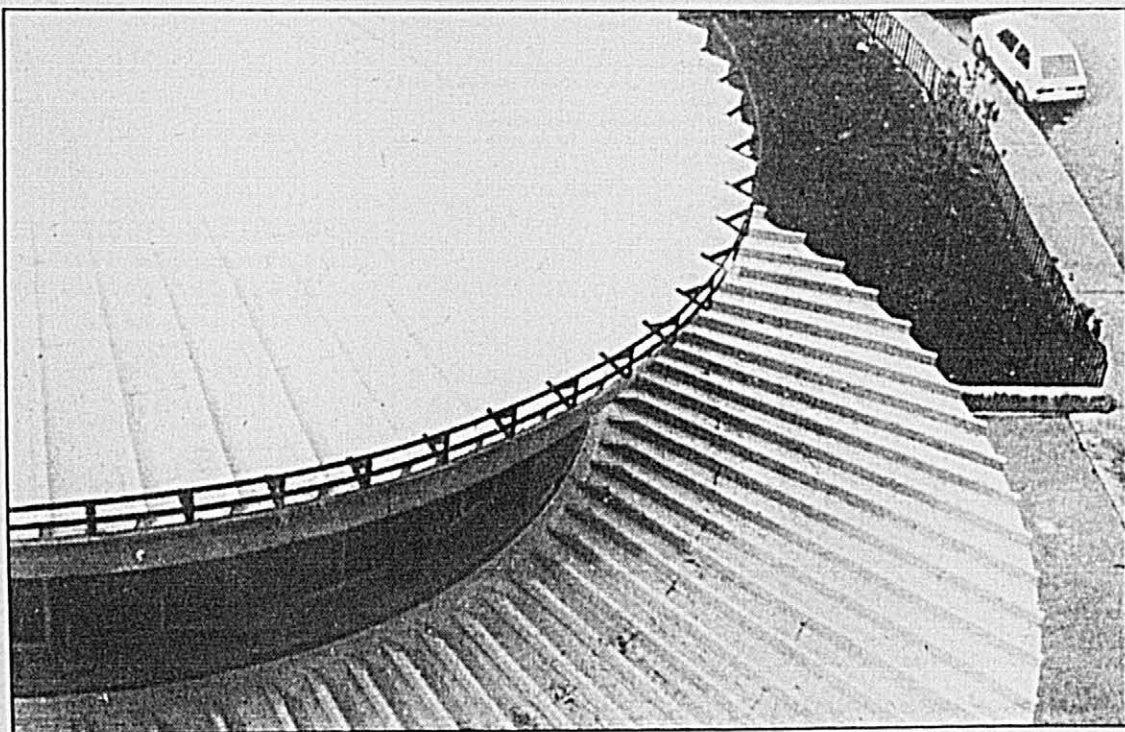

"Women's sports are definitely not taken as seriously as men's", said McKee, whose yearly salary of $500 is less than a third of last year's men's soccer assistant coach. "Women should have their own athletic director and there are certainly a sufficient quantity of women available at Concordia for the job."

"Paul Arsenaault (women's athletic director and full-time men's hockey coach) does not have much contact with any of the women's coaches. As for Ed Enos, he should at least show some interest...once during the season, he should make an attempt to be there during a game. As it is he never shows up," he added.

Women's players are equally disturbed by the situation. Said soccer player Karen Ungerson, "Last week, we brought Arsenaault receipts from our trip to New York and he didn't even realise that we had been away."

Arsenaault considers this criticism justified. "Women have to promote their own program. I can not do it because I have a man's feelings and a man's thoughts. There should be a women's representative."

According to Enos, "Arsenaault was handed the job because it was like the changing of the guard.

"How could I be involved with women's athletics?" he said. "I have a full-time job with academic and administrative duties. I simply do not have time for it."

In 1981, the women's field hockey and volleyball teams were removed from the league competition by the department. Enos said this was done because of the "lack of quantity and quality of players around."

"Field hockey was a new activity on the scene and it did not generate interest. The athletes were just not dedicated," he added.

"Furthermore," he said, "the field hockey coach ran off to Yellowknife and there was no replacement for her."

George Short, who was the women's athletic director at the time had a different explanation.

"Cathy Haig was the coach at the time," he said, "and she ran off with her boyfriend to the Maritimes. Once she left, the girls did not have any desire to continue playing. Also we couldn't find a replacement for her."

Actually Haig left Concordia to take a job in Alberta. Contracted there, she told the Link she left the university for personal reasons. She said she had suggested Vanier College coach Wendy Stack, who expressed interest in the job as a possible replacement. Stack said she was never contacted.

Julie Healy, who was assistant coach and captain of the field hockey team when Haig left, was irate that the team had been scrapped.

"We had an abundance of players that wanted to play," she said, "and he (Enos) is trying to say that we don't have enough. At least 26 people would show up regularly to team practices and games, even though we only had enough equipment for 15 women."

Last year, speaking in the film Why the Difference, Enos suggested that women's teams hold bake sales to raise money for equipment.

"They should do bake sales that they're so good at to raise the money to pay for the equipment," he said.

Waning welfare

by Amy Kaler

So, how much help are you getting now that you're a welfare mother?

Not much. No services specifically for mothers on welfare exist on either the provincial or municipal level, even though the majority of welfare recipients are women.

Mona LaRose of the Social Rights Steering Committee, an advocacy group for welfare recipients staffed by volunteers, says the lack of facilities is one of the greatest problems facing single mothers on welfare.

The problem of getting adequate day care is money, not space, according to LaRose.

However, space is limited. Daniel Fines of l'Office de Garde des Enfants, the agency responsible for monitoring day care, says there are 236 centres in Montréal, which have 12196 places for children.

"It's extremely difficult to find a place" in September, or if the child is between three and five years old, says Fines.

The government only subsidises non-profit centres, and will not subsidise those run by organisations such as the YM-CA.

The per diem subsidy is $3.50 per child, and the building costs of the centre can also be subsidised.

This statement and others outraged women athletes.

"He's a sexist," said field hockey player Marina Kolbe. "He only wants recognition through make sports and care nothing about the women's program."

Reprinted from the Link by Canadian University Press

A limited amount of financial aid is available for parents, on a scale based on the number of adults, the number of children and the net income of the family. The amount of aid per diem varies from $9 per child for families whose net income is less than $12,200 per year, to 50 cents per child for families making over $20,000.

Even this aid is not enough for adequate day care, says LaRose.

"Either mothers stay home and stay on welfare, or get a friend to babysit."

Child abuse is common in in-home day care, and it is nearly impossible to monitor, adds Fines.

Parents on welfare are often faced with a Catch-22. LaRose cites the case of a waitress who will lose her subsidy if she declares her tips as income. Without the subsidy, she will be unable to afford adequate day care for her children.

A single mother with one child receives $556 per month in welfare. This amount is indexed at about one percent every three months. A parent with two dependent children receives $663. For more than two children, there is no increase in payment.

Says LaRose: "The biggest problem? It's money. They just don't give us enough."

You are not alone

Failure

by Leela MadhavaRau

At a recent Arts Faculty Committee meeting, it was reported that 25 per cent of U1 Arts students end their year in unsatisfactory standing.

According to Associate Dean of Arts, Dr. G.L. Piggott, slightly revised statistics indicate 22 per cent of these students have failed to achieve a standing of 2.0. A mark of 2.0 or above ensures that a student remains in satisfactory standing.

These figures have remained constant over the past two years. However, Piggott said that "this is not an isolated phenomenon, the Science Faculty has very comparable figures."

Piggott was adamant his concern did not stem from a fear of outsiders' perceptions of McGill.

"Even if the pattern across Canada was similar, I would be concerned," he said. "These statistics indicate that students are either poorly prepared for admission to McGill or that we are not sufficiently vigilant in our initial selection of students. Should the latter case prove to be correct, it would seem that some are well-prepared but are failing. Perhaps screenings should take place."

When such proposals have been voiced in previous years, the question of the creation of an elitist system has been raised. According to Piggott, "this was an unfortunate interpretation; but it's frustrating for everyone when students with certain expectations, implied by their admission to McGill, discover that they are ill-equipped."

He sees this increase in the level of frustration as a negative factor for students already having to cope with adjustments to university life.

Piggott is at present correlating information for a study on this particular topic.

"We have to look at the record of failing students and see the type of profile they project. However, I will ensure that standards are not lowered, I will not lower standards," he added.

The majority of those students in unsatisfactory standing are in the Economics, Psychology and Industrial Relations departments. Piggott believes it possible that the mathematical component, requiring a knowledge of statistics, is partly to blame. He added, however, that "those who fail to do well in these programmes may not do well in any programme."

Martlets connect at Classic

by Arcle Jones

The Martlet Cagers proudly walked away from the Concordia University Classic held last weekend after playing their most intense and consistent basketball of the season.

Thursday night's come-from-behind victory against Laurentian University might become the turning point in this season's quest for a spot at the national championship. Trailing by 18 points with only 10 minutes left in the game, McGill started an exciting comeback to throw the game into overtime and ultimately win it 90-82 over a dejected Laurentian team.

Then, McGill met arch enemy Bishop's University, one of Canada's most respected (and feared) teams in the tournament's semi-final. The Martlets gave it their best shot as they outran, out-rebounded and out-scored a humiliated Bishop's team for the better part of the game. They were able to set their own fast pace and to dominate both offensively and defensively.

As was expected, the Gaiter women came back to take the lead for the first time in the game with only 4 minutes to go. If it had not been for foul trouble (which made the Martlets hesitate ever so slightly) and a lower field percentage in the second half, the outcome would have been different.

As it turned out, the more experienced, but now humble Bishop's team clinched a 63-53 victory — a margin which does not accurately reflect the closeness of the entire contest.

When they played Winnipeg on Saturday afternoon, the Martlets seemed to be missing the excitement and motivation that had given them the competitive edge over Bishop's the day before. As if they did not have enough problems on their hands, prejudicial calls by a pernicious referee (luckily for everyone he retired after the game) made it impossible for the Martlets to attempt a comeback after trailing 42-35 at the half. Final score was 73-69 in favour of the Wesmen women.

It was disappointing to see the Martlets' hard work end on such a sour note. Nevertheless, coach Lacroix and his troupes were certainly very positive about the tournament as a whole.

Notes:

Annie Constantinides was named tournament all-star. She scored a total of 46 points during the tournament....Helene Couan was a powerhouse with her own 61 points....In the last 2 games the team averaged only 10 turnovers.

They were able to set their own fast pace and to dominate both offensively and defensively.

As was expected, the Gaiter women came back to take the lead for the first time in the game with only 4 minutes to go. If it had not been for foul trouble (which made the Martlets hesitate ever so slightly) and a lower field percentage in the second half, the outcome would have been different.

As it turned out, the more experienced, but now humble Bishop's team clinched a 63-53 victory — a margin which does not accurately reflect the closeness of the entire contest.

When they played Winnipeg on Saturday afternoon, the Martlets seemed to be missing the excitement and motivation that had given them the competitive edge over Bishop's the day before. As if they did not have enough problems on their hands, prejudicial calls by a pernicious referee (luckily for everyone he retired after the game) made it impossible for the Martlets to attempt a comeback after trailing 42-35 at the half. Final score was 73-69 in favour of the Wesmen women.

It was disappointing to see the Martlets' hard work end on such a sour note. Nevertheless, coach Lacroix and his troupes were certainly very positive about the tournament as a whole.

Notes:

Annie Constantinides was named tournament all-star. She scored a total of 46 points during the tournament.....Helene Couan was a powerhouse with her own 61 points.....In the last 2 games the team averaged only 10 turnovers.

(occasionally)

Regulate porn on a local level

Pornography legislation is currently being passed in the Montréal area for the first time since the late sixties.

The municipalities of Dorval, Westmount, Pointe Claire and the City of Montréal have already passed or are considering some legislation of this type. Pointe Claire passed its law early this month, stating "adult literature" had to be sold on racks five feet off the ground and behind an opaque barrier. The three other jurisdictions are still pondering exactly what laws they will enact.

The city council of Dorval is concentrating on a re-zoning law to push pornographic establishments into the industrial sector of the city. Montréal's council is still reviewing a motion presented by the Municipal Action Group to regulate pornographic advertisement. Westmount is considering a proposal similar to that of Pointe Claire.

Each municipality is targeting one, and only one, aspect of the pornography industry. It is a start, but not the bull's eye. Dorval's proposed legislation covers zoning, Montréal's advertisement and Pointe Claire's distribution. No municipality is reviewing licensing laws for pornographic establishments or age requirements for purchasing pornographic publications.

Eventually municipal councils may pass comprehensive laws regulating pornography, even if they only do so by incorporating proposals enacted in surrounding areas.

Pornography regulation is a federal issue, so municipal governments are restricted in that they cannot outlaw pornography or refuse to license such establishments until the Criminal Code is changed. Several groups in Montréal are working on such a reform. However, even within their limited realm of power, local governments are short-sheeting their constituents on protection from pornography.

Pornography, in the form of advertisements or magazines, is an every-day issue that should be legislated as much as possible on a local level due to its grass-roots nature. Children are accosted by it daily on their way home from school and the general public slapped with it in buying a carton of milk at the store.

Consequently, it is an issue local officials should take to heart.

Gazette editorial
November 21, 1983

Asked if he considered it unethical to use grant money ($40,000) for company purposes and then pay it back, (Vice-Principal, Research) Maclachlan replied: "I think if it had been a very large chunk he would have asked for approval.... I think it would be on such a small scale as not to worry. It doesn't bother me."

Gazette
October 23, 1983

A university cannot function properly under clouds of suspicion about its governance. Charges of impropriety have been levied against two McGill professors in the Department of Microbiology and equally serious charges about failures by the administration to control events. To date these charges have been dealt with only in a piece-meal or ad hoc way. Meanwhile The McGill Daily has been left to battle on its own against injunctions that constrain its investigative reporting.

Public scrutiny of events surrounding the operation of a commercial venture in the Medical Faculty's Microbiology Department began with an article in the October 23 issue of the Montreal Gazette that was followed by two other articles and an editorial in that paper and by a series of articles in The McGill Daily. More recently, The Sunday Express of November 27 has picked up the story. The Gazette's October 23 report carried a number of allegations about the effects of the venture on teaching, on research and on academic freedom in the Department. It also pictured University administrators at best as ignorant of a situation over which they have direct jurisdiction and possibly derelict about their fiduciary responsibilities.

The newspaper claimed specifically, for example, that a surgeon studying for a Ph.D. was ordered to quit the Department for his "disloyalty" in speaking to a Gazette reporter. It claimed faculty members within the unit believed part of federal grant and some departmental funds were diverted to buy supplies and equipment for the commercial venture. It claimed there was a reluctance on the part of faculty members to comment on questions surrounding the operation of the commercial venture on University premises, for fear of "the adverse effect their publicly voiced criticism might have on their careers."

The Gazette also reported that McGill had allowed itself to become a significant holder of speculative equities in this commercial venture while at the same time renting laboratory space in Microbiology to one of the ventures' three companies. Despite McGill's involvement, Vice Principal Maclachlan was reported not to have told the Board of Governors of the company's presence on McGill property because he "thought" the company would be moving "in the near future". Vice Principal Maclachlan, was also quoted (see above) to appear to confirm that $40,000 of public funds for university research had been unofficially borrowed and as not being worried about the ethics of the transaction. The Daily maintains that McGill did not properly apply its patent policy, and that the University negotiated a patent agreement with the commercial venture while the question of who had patent rights was still in dispute. A former McGill University research associate claims to have made a significant contribution to the venture while working at McGill, but without his contribution being recognised in the company's patent applications (Gazette, Oct 23 & Nov 15, 1983).

These widely publicised charges must be dealt with publicly and promptly. The McGill Faculty Union calls for an enquiry that will investigate the events and the administrative handling of these events. Nothing short of this will do, for nothing else can lay the allegations to rest. If they are substantiated, remedy must deal directly with the individual abuses and failures of policy.

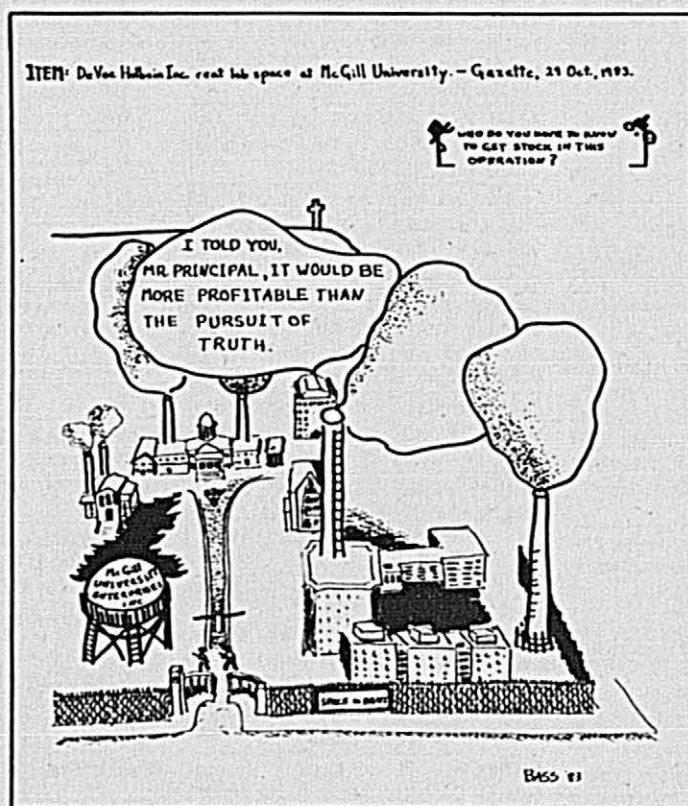

In the report from the public enquiry, the history of events that underlie what has been published needs to be described accurately and in full detail. The allegations of suppression of facts, and intimidation of students and staff that have surrounded the affair must be tested impartially and vigorously. The rules that have governed research for profit need to be clarified and the extent to which administrative officers have or have not carried out their duties under these rules must be established and reported.

Obviously such questions as these will not vanish. An audit of funds would be insufficient, even less sufficient would be an internal audit. An audit cannot uncover unethical practices or even improper borrowing of funds later returned.

Closed door and slow-moving deliberations within the Academic Industrial Relations Research Committee cannot serve the need for openness and speed. The appearance of a "cover-up" or a "white-wash" will have a profound effect on the academic future of the University.

No one suggests allegations be treated as established fact. Only a thorough and open enquiry, however, can ensure confidence is returned by the public at large to the University and by the University community to its administrators. Surely McGill academics will welcome a public enquiry conducted promptly and openly, without fear or favour.

Chilean and Salvadorean universities

Students fight for political reform

by Melinda Wittstock

Imagine running across town to a lawyer's office where your economics class is held as gunshots ring out in the air around you. On the way, you see some friends playing volleyball on the street; others are helping some children learn to read and write. You run faster when you see some soldiers break up both the game and the tutoring. They drag a few of your friends away. You wonder whether you'll ever see them again.

A university student in Chile or El Salvador lives in a country whose military regime is responsible for arbitrary arrests, disappearances, torture and assassinations of its own population. Professors and administrators are not exempt from these government actions.

The University of El Salvador (UES), located in the country's capital of San Salvador, and other Latin American universities have often been the focus of such repression. The UES, closed for 15 months in 1971 and six months in 1976 because of anti-government demonstrations, was closed again on June 26, 1980.

During the three hours when Salvadorean tanks and helicopters invaded the campus, more than 6,000 members of the university community were caught inside the walls of the besieged university. In the ensuing violence, more than 40 students were murdered and others seriously wounded. Close to 300 people were incarcerated, and many "disappeared". The university's buildings were bombed, books burned and equipment stolen.

Since the occupation, the university campus has been a ghost-town. Until recently, the presence of tanks and heavily-armed soldiers had turned the university into a venerable military base.

The UES has since been operating "illegally", holding classes in facilities made available by hospitals, lawyers, doctors and trade unionists. According to UES students quoted in a working paper published by the El Salvador Committee of the Université de Montréal, classes also are held "in workers' homes in the capital, on plantations, in refugee camps and on battlefronts".

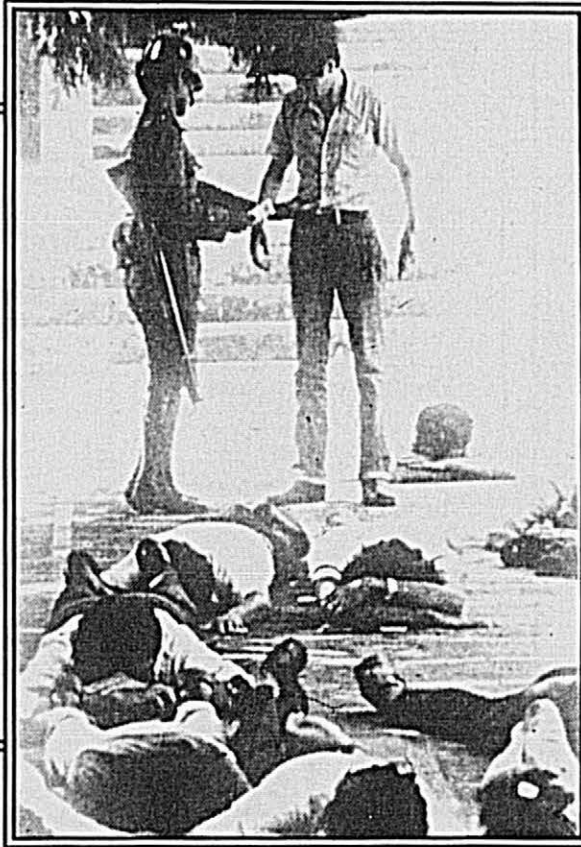

In an attempt to demilitarise and rebuild the university as well as regain autonomy from the military junta, the rector of the (UES), Dr. Félix Ulloa, was assassinated by the military on October 29, 1980.

The junta justified its military occupation, the assassination of Ulloa and the murder of 40 people as "a preventative measure" under the pretext that the university was a "sanctuary for subversion", a training post for guerrillas and an arms depot, according to an April 1983 Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) Bulletin.

Recently, the Salvadorean government, prodded by its constitution and international outrage, ordered the troops off campus. However, all the damaged buildings remain unusable and major renovations are still needed. It will cost upwards of $15 million to restore the university to its former standard, but the government, with its increasing demand for military expenditures, is unwilling to provide the funding for these reparations.

According to the same CAUT Bulletin, the administration of the 142-year-old university presently resides on the top floor of a public building donated by the government. There, a few remaining documents and a single photocopying machine, which somehow escaped destruction, are housed. Card-board boxes are used as filing cabinets, card tables as desks. The vast law library of 100,000 books has been reduced to a few shelves. What remains of the scientific laboratories and research equipment is a "pathetic assortment of materials that would be inadequate in a junior high school".

Despite these circumstances, classes go on, albeit somewhat clandestinely. Since its closure, a dedicated group of faculty members and administrators continue to teach and provide degree programs by using public facilities. In fact, students are still receiving diplomas from the UES.

The university was disbanded in a desperate attempt to isolate the students from each other to prevent them from organising. Consequently, students are hidden in make-shift classrooms all over the city.

According to CEGEP professor Rosalie Armstrong, students are trying to make their presence felt, not only by demonstrating against the military, but also by such apolitical activities as baseball games in the streets.

But, even baseball games are seen to be politically subversive. She said, "It drives the military mad."

Some governments in Latin America "attack anything where people find strength — the Church, universities, community groups, and student organisations," added Armstrong. Armstrong worked briefly in El Salvador with Mothers of the Disappeared, an organisation of mothers who have had family members incarcerated or arrested by the government.

Since Latin American students, and many administrators, have traditionally been at the forefront of political reform movements, student organisations, including universities, have been the targets of government oppression.

In El Salvador and Chile, the student movement has never confined its struggle to universities. Rather, their participation in popular struggle has always been strong and well-organised.

The Asociación General de Estudiantes Univeritarios Salvadoreños (AGEUS) explains the reason for government repression:

"They want to oppose any student movement aligned with popular struggle, to eliminate the social sensibility and conscience of students and to convert them into mechanical pieces of the capitalist system, isolated from the problems of the exploited and oppressed people."

"The reality of our universities is their ties with the people," reports the June 1983 edition of the Boletín Informativo, a Salvadorean student publication.

While university students usually come from the upper-middle and upper classes, most do not close their eyes to, and many actually protest against, the poverty and oppression of their countries. Both the student activity and government reprisals hold true throughout Latin America.

"The university should make the people's interests its own; to do otherwise is to abandon it completely," Félix Ulloa, son of the slain rector and a professor of Labour Law at UES, was quoted as saying in the same Boletín Informativo.

Students face the same predicament in Chile, where they, too, have historically fought for democracy against dictatorship as well as for day-to-day reforms in the university.

After the Chilean military coup on September 11, 1973, hundreds of students, professors and administrators were killed, tortured, arrested or expelled permanently from their positions. Others were simply reported missing.

The universities were the prime targets for repression as "fascists are traditionally enemies of culture and its institutions. They have denied all academic freedom and development of culture," reported a working paper on Chile published by McGill's Centre for Developing Area Studies (CDAS).

According to the same document, once in power, the totalitarian regime of General Pinochet quickly deemed all universities "a hot-bed of subversion".

The military felt "justified" in crushing all dissent by not only deleting "subversive" courses from the programme, but by refusing student and university associations the right to function.

Similar to the occupation in El Salvador, the National Technical University (NTU), in Santiago, was surrounded by armed forces and bombed the day after the coup.

"The military took 700 of us prisoners; as Principal, I was pushed against a wall and they aimed to fire, but fortunately changed their minds. I was sent to Dawson Island (near the South Pole) where I was imprisoned for two years," stated Enrique Kirberg, Principal of NTU at the time, in the CDAS paper. He is presently a professor of Latin American Studies at Columbia University in New York.

All eight universities in Chile were taken over by the military. Generals, colonels and officers were appointed as administrators and professors, to replace those considered "subversive". Several departments of each university were closed — among them Political Science, Philosophy, Journalism and the Social Sciences.

"New requirements were established for university graduation: 90 class hours in courses on subversion, political 'deviations', political and ideological aggression, national defence and the Junta's doctrine of national security," explained Kirberg in the document.

The long tradition of the strong student movement was wiped out with one swipe of Pinochet's arm. All the reforms students and administrators had brought about before the assassination of Salvador Allende in 1973, were revoked.

Until that time, students had fought for and achieved the democratisation of Chilean universities. Not only were administrators elected by the community, but students had input into the decisions being made.

"While I was principal, the students...were among my closest collaborators in directing the university," said Kirberg in the working paper.

The universities became more accessible to the working class and the peasantry, as funding was allocated specifically to ensure that at least 30 per cent of the student population came from low income families.

It has only been in the last three years that students, loyal to their long traditions, have regained their past strength. Of late, the occurrence of popular demonstrations has increased.

"Students are no longer afraid. The government cannot control (them) now," said Sergio Martinez, a Canadian correspondent for the Chilean newspaper Revista Hoy.

"In the past, the student movement was always closely aligned with the struggle of the working class. After the coup, classes were isolated from each other so that for four or five years, there was absolutely no contact. Lately this has changed," he added.

Although it is a positive note that students, in both El Salvador and Chile, are gaining more ground in fighting for democracy in their universities and countries, thousands of Latin American students are still "disappearing," being tortured or assassinated in large numbers.

Unfortunately, it may be a long, violent struggle.
